Air Force's Crossroads flea market now online

Site can assist members during PCS

By SSgt Amy Parr
Air Force Print News

WASHINGTON – The Air Force's Crossroads Web site recently unveiled its newest service, a flea market.

The site was built at the request of the Air Force community to ease permanent change-of-station moves and help improve retention, said Stefanie Myers, community programs research assistant for the Air Force Family Matters Office.

"People almost religiously want to go through and get rid of things when they PCS," she said. "We realized there wasn't any centralized location for Air Force members to post items for sale (over the Internet)."

With the flea market option, Myers said people can post items, categorized into the auto lot, boat lot, household items, and homes and apartments. They can also search by location and item type.

Currently, only the auto lot is up and running. Myers said the boat lot should be running by the end of the month.

"It's totally free and for members of the Air Force community only," she said. Access is password-protected.

Once it is known throughout the Air Force, Myers said, the flea market will work well. People relocating can check out the site and see what is offered at their new base before they go and continue looking once they arrive.

The site will also work well for people going overseas. Oftentimes, Myers said families only bring one vehicle. When they arrive, people can see what is available on the site to buy. When they leave, they can list the vehicle on the site for someone else to purchase.

"They may not need their lawn mower or garden tools and want to sell them," she said.

"Or they may have curtains that no longer fit their windows."
